In recent years, Cloud Computing has transformed local businesses and created new business models on the Internet. And Cloud services are still flourishing—but after the emphatic hype in the early years; we have also experienced several security issues since then. In addition to well-known attacks that have been carried out against web applications for years, Cloud Computing created new as well as amplified existing vulnerabilities that now have to be dealt with.

This Special Track seeks to foster discussion and debate security-related issues of Cloud Computing, like threats, attack vectors, risk analysis, security solutions or penetration testing.

Topics include, but not limited to:

- Attack vectors
- Attacks on Cloud services
- Conceptual or technical security solutions
- Cloud-related security protocols or applications of cryptography
- Risk and threat analysis
- Penetration testing of Cloud services

We would also be interested in papers which address the needs of real world applications such as: educational needs, health provision, financial institutions, central government, local government, insurance, manufacturing, energy, transport, and so on.
