along with ACHI 2020, The Thirteenth International Conference on Advances in Computer-Human Interactions

June 21 - 25, 2020 - Valencia, Spain

In many application-oriented subjects (e.g., mechanical engineering, mining engineering, medicine, etc.) practical teaching in higher education is a fundamental challenge. At this point, digital technologies increasingly build the bridge between theory and practice. A strong focus is on collaborative forms of learning, blended learning approaches, and opportunities for individualized learning both in contact- and in self-study. Thus, 3D visualizations, animations and simulations are being increasingly used to convey processes more vividly and more practically. These forms of learning occur not only in academic but also in vocational education and training. Besides the investigation of the effects of digital tools on learning processes with focus on the learners, current research also needs examination of the teachers’ perspective: e.g., guidance towards or in digitalization or effects on the design of learning processes/formats.

This track aims at current scientific findings on digital learning technologies. Evaluations and findings from practical application should be included as well as theoretical concept papers and project descriptions.

Topics include, but not limited to:

- Evaluation of digital learning tools
- Usability testing
- UI/UX design of digital learning tools
- Technology acceptance among students and teachers
- Knowledge transfer
- Team collaboration
- Effects of digital learning tools
- Learning analytics
