Computer vision and learning algorithms are integral components for robotic systems. Research in these areas receives significant attention and algorithmic advances in vision, learning and their combination are widespread. However, much work is still only evaluated on datasets or in laboratory conditions. Consequently, the usability for robotic applications in the real world remains to be truly validated.

The goal of this special track is to promote development in computer vision and learning for solving real-world robotic applications. As such, the focus is on technological advances for visual sensors; data acquisition and datasets; robot vision in the wild; overcoming the challenges of deploying learning-based methods in real-world systems; interfacing vision and learning; integration for high-speed control; and methods applied to navigation, semantic understanding, manipulation, decision making and cognitive behaviour.

Topics include, but not limited to:
- Technological developments for robot vision
- Robotic datasets
- Robot and machine vision in the wild
- Object detection, recognition and tracking
- Visual learning
- High-speed control
- Application of reinforcement and deep learning in robotics
- Sim-to-real transfer
- Advanced grasping and manipulation
- Robots for service, industry, autonomous driving, transportation, agriculture and construction
